JULY 2026

BRAINLYHQ

We want to take a moment to speak openly, directly, and honestly with our community about where Brainly HQ stands following the conclusion of July. Following the transparent approach established in our previous Management Blogs, this update is deliberately not a marketing post, nor is it an attempt to paint a picture where everything is flawless. Instead, it is a candid reflection on our progress, the challenges we are currently observing, and the clear steps we are taking to address them.

From an ecosystem expansion perspective, July proved to be an exceptionally productive and successful month for our core infrastructure. We achieved several major technological milestones that significantly advance the foundation of our platform. Most notably, we officially deployed our main website operating directly under the primary brainly.com domain, establishing a permanent and centralized home for our project hub, web features, and community documentation. Alongside this rollout, we successfully launched Brainly Speech, bringing real-time voice synthesis and advanced audio capabilities into our system. Parallel to these structural upgrades, our team maintained a consistently high volume of community events throughout the month and fully implemented the long-awaited Piggy Bank system, successfully delivering another integral piece of our planned interactive economy.

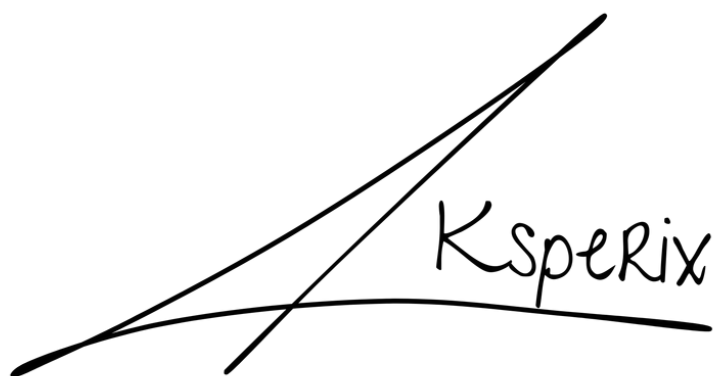

To be completely frank and realistic, however, these major technical victories do not tell the whole story. Despite our ecosystem progress, overall user activity and daily message volume on the Discord server experienced a sharp and noticeable decline throughout July. According to our internal analytical data, a primary driver of this shift is the summer holiday season. During this time of year, users naturally spend less time in front of their screens, travel more frequently, and have significantly less discretionary time to devote to online community participation.

At the same time, we refuse to treat external seasonal factors as a complete excuse. We recognize that our internal system design bears a substantial portion of the responsibility. While our server events remain highly attractive and well-received, relying primarily on short-term engagement loops without sufficient economic depth has proven to be a bottleneck. When user leisure time becomes constrained, an economy that lacks a vast catalog of meaningful items, long-term progression paths, and diverse sinks simply fails to provide a strong enough reason for members to log in daily.

We are actively using these insights to refine our development roadmap for August and beyond. Our immediate operational priority is to fundamentally expand the depth of our server ecosystem. To achieve this, we are accelerating the rollout of new functional items, expanding our overall item catalog, and deepening the core mechanics of Science Scavengers. By introducing a wider array of collectible assets, scientific items, and meaningful progression tiers, we aim to build a robust, balanced economy that provides genuine long-term value - ensuring that every interaction on the server feels rewarding regardless of how much time a user has available.

Thank you for your candid feedback, your ongoing participation, and your continued trust in our team as we work through these challenges and build the future of Brainly HQ together.
